We've contacted over 570 industry professionals and conducted over 50 interviews to understand the market and test our hypothesis. During this time we've also launched the product MVP, which won a 1st runner up at a Google a few months ago. We're now looking to validate whether the solution solves the initial problems identified. However, this has been more challenging as sometimes the prospective user who is facing the problem is not the decision maker who can end up purchasing the solution -- and vice versa. Therefore, we need investment to keep going to find exactly 'who' feels

What is your go-to-market strategy? *

(323 characters remaining)

There are three different stages of the go-to-market strategy. First stage is closing 3 or more individual building managers of commercial properties. The ICP is a building operator of offices or malls who have access to BIM or BMS, but no analytics budget to process these datasets. Second stage is to pursue an innovative REIT who is open to piloting cutting-edge technologies in one of their top-tier facilities (or a strata section), such as a mall, high-rise office, or industrial building. Third stage is also a REIT who has a large and differentiated portfolio of buildings that has ambitious decarbonization and digitization goals
